A small town stacked with talent

"A small town, stacked with talent!" was the sentiment around our table at the Heritage Players show "Back to the 30s – A Night at the Cabaret" last week.

Congratulations to the writers and directors for a clever production incorporating modern technology with good old-fashioned theatrical skill.

The show was set as a night out for Tairua's early residents, Harold and Phyllis Cory-Wright at a cabaret in Auckland. Woven into the tale was wonderful slapstick humour, interesting local historical information and photography, enthusiastic song and dance, historical video footage of a national tragedy, wonderful musical accompaniment, clever and engaging acting and the best delivery of lines by a six-year old I have ever experienced! A thoroughly enjoyable and absorbing night out!

Introduced by cabaret continuity comperes George and Trilby, the items were interspersed with local and national history. One such national history event, the footage of 1931 Hawkes Bay earthquake, was narrated by actors on stage and was received by the audience in absolute silence, such was the dramatic effect. On the other side of the coin, so to speak, the humour evident throughout the show was a wonderful counterpoint to such an impact.

Nola Langford, Grant Brooks, Rory Tope and Rowena Burkinshaw in "Mending Monsters", one of the skits in the Heritage Players' show last week.

In a wonderful production in which everyone played their part, my pick of stand-out actors included Rowena Burkinshaw who became her characters with gusto, Rocky Blucher whose interactions with the cast and audience always resulted in fits of laughter, and the ghoulish duo of Grant Brooks, who was a most convincing Count

Dracula, and Rory Tope, who was an hilarious Frank N Stein. But the most impressive performance, in my view, came from six-year old Neo Girard during the Earthquake sequence, who recited the lines of his lengthy dialogue without prompt or mistake! Well done Tairua Heritage Society and Tairua Heritage Players! Another great show!
